Re: Testimony in opposition to RB 974

I am writing in opposition to RB 974 for a number of reasons, but most importantly because the instructional strategies referred to as "Developmental / relationship-based therapy" could mean any number of intervention programs, all without a basis of research demonstrating the efficacy of these interventions.

Most typically, this term is used to describe "Relationship Development Intervention" or "RDI". This is a for-profit company, RDIconnect (aka The Connections Center) located in Houston Texas, that both trains and provides certification, and no one other than this agency can provide this training. This "certification" program is not accredited by the National Council for Certifying Agencies or by any other independent accreditation body.

There are only two "certified consultants" residing in the state of Connecticut at this time (see the RDIconnect at <http://www.rdiconnect.com/pages/Find-a-Consultant.aspx>) and only 156 nationwide. Many of these individuals possess only a bachelor's degree in any number of areas that are not related to education, psychology, education, or special education, and these individuals have no other training related to autism other than the 3 week seminars offered by the Connection Center.

While parents can and do elect to have their children with autism participate in any number of alternative therapies that do not have any empirical basis, insurance companies should not be compelled to pay for these services which can be best characterized as experimental intervention.

Yours truly,
